AMERICAN GRAIN SHIPMENTS. The supplying of grain to foreign urchasers is to be no easy task; and here is not the assurance it will prove profitable which is inviting to rain which Europe needs, but war neans a blockade of the ports of the contending nations, and a blockade means that ships carrying contraband of war will be shut out. Grain is of the very essence of contraband for such manufacturing nations as Great Britain, France and Germany. The grain ships must sail under neutral flags, and the grain must be consigned to neutral ports to escape seizure, But even though consigned to neutral ports it is by no means certain that it would be exempt if any of the combatants hellowed it was intended ultimately for the memy.

A grain ship headed for Genoa with cargo that could be shipped thence Austria and Germany, says an authority, might be regarded as the proper prey of English, French or Rusdan warships. The selzure of such a cargo would immediately call for a meditated. protest from Washington, and he who ramed the protest should have all the precedents of the past at his instant mand. In addition, he should be backed by the whole United States navy to enforce our views regarding the rights of our commerce.

But wishes had to give up in a minute more to undeniable realities, for the baby's intermittent walls now became a steady stream of howis calculated to convince the most sceptical of brothers that there was a baby in the house. The room began once again to seem foreign. Lewis, like the old lady of the nursery rhyme who was so unfortunately deprived of her petticoats, had the old sensation of wondering the wicker basket gazing anxiously at the wee red thing poking her arms about so almiessly in the air. His mother glanced at him, in her turn a pron winked, but Lewis did not see that. Neither did he see both ladies at something.

"May I hold the little new sistef? Isn't she darling? Lewis wants to see if she's worth..."

"Shut up, you," commanded Lewis brothers that there was a baby in the house. The room began once again to seem foreign. Lewis, like the old lady of the nursery rhyme who was so unfortunately deprived of her petiticoats, had the odd sensation of wondering foriornly "If I be I?" The old lady, Lewis reflected, had a little dog to help her find out. He wished he had one no, he didn't, either, because the old lady found out with the help of her little dog that she wasn't herself, and perhaps if he had a dog he'd find out that he wasn't himself and that the baby was real.
